THE advantages for studying the principles of harmony being, in this country, so limited, it cannot be expected that a composition of this nature can stand the test of criticism. This circumstance considered, it is hoped that candid allowances will be made in the perusal of the following sheets, which are respectfully submitted to the public eye.

With respect to the design of the composition, it may be observed, that it is adapted, as far as possible, to the rules of pronunciation. Consequently, the music requires a moderate movement; for it is very difficult to follow the exact motion of the pendulum, and pronounce with that propriety and elegance, which the importance of the subject may demand. It may then be proper here to remark, that sentiment and expression ought to be the principal guide in vocal music.

Perhaps some may be disappointed, that futing pieces are in general omitted. But the principal reason why few were inserted was the trifling effect produced by that sort of music; for the parts, falling in, one after another, each conveying a different idea, confound the sense, and render the performance a mere jargon of words. The numerous pieces of this kind, extant, must be a sufficient apology for omitting them here.

Subscribers are most respectfully thanked for their encouragement of the work: And they are assured that great attention has been paid to render it correct. Such errors as escaped notice, while the work was in the press, are pointed out in the Errata.

Should what is now offered, meet acceptance, additions will hereafter be made of congregational and occasional pieces, with some hints upon expression.

To become in some degree useful to the community was the motive for this publication; which, it is earnestly wished, may answer the end designed.

January, 1791.

A concise INTRODUCTION to the GROUNDS of MUSIC.

MUSIC consists in a succession of pleasing sounds, and is naturally divided into Melody and Harmony. Melody is a series of single sounds. Harmony is the pleasing union of two or more single sounds. Modulation is the art of changing the key or mode, in which a piece of music is composed. So long as we preserve the fundamental harmony, without departing from the degrees of the octave, the key is still the same; but when we make a cadence in any new key, some one of the degrees must be changed from natural to sharp or flat. The principal distinctions of musical sounds are time and tune; to the combination of these two qualities is chiefly to be ascribed the pleasing and endless variety of the musical art.

Of the general SCALE of MUSIC.

THE notes of the scale are seven, distinguished in a certain order by the first seven letters of the alphabet, A, B, C, D, E, F, G; and when we have ascended to the eighth note, the same order is repeated.

Three octaves being seldom within the compass of the human voice, the bass staff is therefore assigned to the gravest voices of men, the tenor staff to the highest of men's voices, the counter staff to boys voices, or the lowest voices of women, and the treble staff to the highest voices of women.

GENERAL SCALE.

A Cliff is a character placed at the beginning of a staff, showing what sound of the general scale it represents.

This character, , called the F cliff, is used only in the bass. It has the seventh degree of sound in the general scale.

This character, , called the C cliff, is commonly used in the counter. It has the eleventh degree of sound in the general scale.

This character, , called the G cliff, is used in tenor and treble, and sometimes in counter. It has the fifteenth degree of sound in the general scale, in a woman's voice, but in a man's voice, it has the eighth degree of sound. This character,  gs, is frequently used instead of the above, and has the same name.

Above mi, are faw, fol, law, faw, fol, law ; and below mi, law, fol, faw, law, fol, faw, and then comes mi.

Observe that from B to C, and from E to F, ascending or descending, are semitones. The rest are whole tones. But, if the mi be transposed to any other letter, between mi and faw, and law and faw, the distance is but a semitone, ascending or descending. The rest are whole tones, as before.

A Staff		five lines, with their spaces, whereon the musick is written.
Brace		shows how many parts are sung together.

Examples.

Ledger Line — is added, when notes ascend, or descend, a line beyond the staff.

Flat  $b$ , set before a note, sinks it half a tone.

Sharp  $\sharp$  raises a note half a tone.

Each of these  $b$   $\sharp$ , set at the beginning of a tune, has influence through the tune, unless contradicted by a natural  $\natural$ .

Natural  $\natural$  reduces a note, made flat or sharp, to its primitive sound.

Repeat  $\text{||:} \text{or } : \text{||}$  shows what part of the tune is to be sung over again, from any note, against which it is placed.

Figures show that the note under figure 1 is sung before the repeat; and the 1. 2. note under figure 2, after passing that under figure 1; if tied together by a slur, both are sung after the repeat.

Slur  $\frown$  is drawn over, or under so many notes as are sung to one syllable.

Hold  $\text{~}$  directs that the sound of the note, over which it is placed, should be continued beyond its customary length.

Marks of distinction  $'$  signify that the notes, over which they are placed, should be sung as distinctly and emphatically as possible.

Names. Characters. Explanations.

Direct  is set at the end of a staff, to direct the performer to the first note in the next staff.

Figure 3  set over, or under any three notes, denotes that they are sung in the time of two notes of the same kind.

Point of Addition  adds to the sound of a note; e. g. when set to a semibreve, it makes it equal to three minims, &c.

Single bar  divides the time agreeably to the measure note.

Double bar  shows the end of a strain.

Close  shows the end of a tune.

Trill, or Shake  is used as a grace, and may be either open, or close. e. g. if the note, next above the note to be shaken, (whence the shake is always begun) be a whole tone, it is an open shake; but, if it be but a semitone distant, it is a close shake.

Appoggiaura, or
notes  are notes to lean on, in passing intervals, and must be dwelt upon, according to the value or length of the note.

Examples.

Names. Characters.

Explanations.

Legature, or tie  comprehends two, or more notes of any kind, being on the same line, or space, with a slur over them, which must be sung, as one continued sound.

Choosing notes  are notes placed in a direct line over each other, either of which, or both, may be sung.

Examples.

Of the K E Y S, and T R A N S P O S I T I O N.

THERE are but two natural keys in music, viz. C the Major or sharp, and A the Minor or flat key. No tune can be formed on any other key, without placing either flats or sharps at the beginning of the staff, which brings them to the same effect, as the two natural keys. A key note is the last note in the bass, and contains the air of the tune, being the foundation of all the other parts.

The two Natural Keys.

The first is called A, the natural Minor key, having the less 3d, 6th and 7th above its key note.

The second is called C, the natural Major key, having the greater 3d, 6th and 7th above its key note, being half a tone sharper in first third.

OF T R A N S P O S I T I O N of K E Y S.

THE first thing to be considered in transposition is the mi, which is the master, or leading note, guiding all the rest, both above and low.

The preceding are all the modes at present in use. The proportion between the several modes is omitted; directive terms being now generally used to regulate the performance.

Accent is a certain force of voice upon particular parts of a bar, which must coincide with emphatical words. In common time, where there are four beats in a bar, the accented are the first and third parts of the bar; where there are but two beats, it generally falls upon the first part of the bar. In triple time, the accent, commonly, falls upon the first part of the bar.

Observe that, in all modes of time, the hand must fall at the beginning, and rise at the close of each bar.

LET every person take the part, to which his voice is best adapted. For, if one sing tenor whose organs are formed for the bass, he will hang as a weight upon others, which will sink the tune from its original pitch.

The mouth ought to be opened so as to give the voice free passage. By neglecting this, a good voice will be spoiled, and a bad one made worse.

Singing through the nose has a most disagreeable effect upon the hearer. No one would commit this fault a second time, were he made sensible of his error.

Many singers conceive that they sing well, when they exert the whole strength of the voice. This precludes all delicacy of taste and expression; and renders the performance at best but a dissonant bawling. By singing within the natural compass of the voice, we retain the power of swelling occasionally and of giving force to particular passages.

Pronouncing distinctly, and with propriety, is one of the most essential considerations in singing. Great attention, therefore, ought to be paid to emphasis; for without it the ideas will be obscure; and the design of the music lost.

Words beginning with a vowel ought not to be pronounced, as if they began with a consonant. This is a very common fault; and is occasioned by shutting, instead of opening the mouth, previously to the pronouncing of vowel sounds.

The singer should pay all possible attention to what he is performing. For, if the hearer have reason to suspect the singer to be heedless of the subject, in which he pretends to be engaged, he will be disgusted both with him and his performance.

To sing without affectation of any kind, to fall naturally into the passion of the song, and to execute it feelingly, without any efforts, but such as are proper to the passion, cannot fail of being agreeable to the hearer.

Care should be taken that every note be sounded; for by omitting the sound of one, we may perhaps lose the force of several succeeding notes.

After the true sound of each note is learnt, graces, &c. may claim attention.

A profound silence ought to be observed, wherever it is intended by the composer, that the composition be not injured; which will be the consequence of introducing sounds where none were designed.

Attention should be paid to all the terms, which are placed over the music to direct the performance; as they greatly assist expression; and will have a surprising effect, if conducted with judgment. Yet they are seldom observed; or if they be, it is in so negligent a manner, as to produce little, or no effect upon the hearer.

Great care should be taken in the performance, that the inner parts may not predominate, but be subservient to the principal part.

To perform acceptably, it is highly necessary that the subject, in the first place, be thoroughly understood; then repeated agreeably to the best rules of pronunciation. Afterward, the notes are to be applied; and a particular attention paid to emphatical words. In some places, the time ought to wait for expression. In others, the movement should be quickened. There should likewise be a cessation of sound between; and frequently in the middle of many sentences, especially those, which are important, sublime and expressive, that the mind may have the power, in some degree, of realizing the idea. The Piano and *For*te should also be strictly regarded. The performance being thus regulated, the whole force of the sentiments will be impressed upon the mind. We may then enter into the spirit, and justice may be done to every part of the composition.

Hence the necessity of an instructor's being master, not only of sounds, but of language and pronunciation. In both reading and speaking, the propriety, moderation, and rapidity of pronunciation, depend upon the judgment of the person employed in either.

The expressing of sentiments through the medium of harmony, must in the same manner depend upon the judgment of the performer. Therefore, every instructor should endeavour to assist the judgment of his pupils, by explaining the nature and design of music, as adapted to particular sentiments or passions, that their performances may be executed in a manner adequate to the particularity of the subject.

Above all, let a suitable attention be paid to the important truths uttered in singing, that the great judge of quick and dead may be praised with reverence and solemnity.

PARTICULAR REMARKS.

In tunes of three parts, and in those, which have a double bass, in the following work, the upper is considered as the tenor, or leading part; and the treble, or second part, is placed between that and the bass. In tunes of four parts, the order is this, 1st. the bass, 2d. the tenor, 3d. the counter, and 4th the treble.

Wherever choosing notes occur, in any part, it may be proper to divide the voices, that one division of them may perform the upper, and the other the lower series of notes, which will increase the harmony.

The pitch of a tune ought not to be taken from the tenor, but from the key note in the bass, the tone of which note determines the air of the composition.
